New website for NCEA students:

Censorship in New Zealand – Information for Students

The Classification Office has just launched a website specifically designed for high school media students who study censorship as part of their course. The site features case studies of classified films and games, a historical timeline, FAQs, video clips of lectures by the Chief Censor – and lots more information about how New Zealand's classification system works.

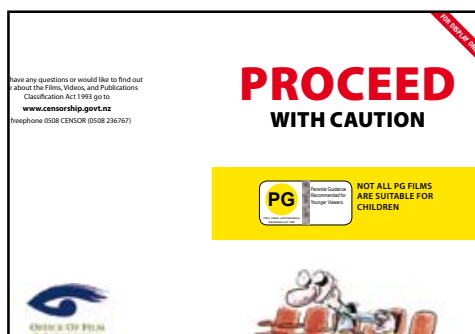

You can access the site from the home page or schools section of our main website at www.censorship.govt.nz.

Resource pack for libraries

A resource pack has been offered to school librarians (members of SLANZA). It contains resources for libraries including:

A DVD-slick resource:

This contains a disc with different pdf designs explaining the meaning of the classification labels – print them off, put them on empty DVD cases and put them on the shelves with your DVDs.

Censorship In New Zealand – Information for Students:

This flyer outlines some features of the new student's website.

The resource has been popular. If you would like to order a pack for your library please email your request to information@censorship.govt.nz.
